

The Yorkshire Moss-Lynx

Opening hook	Have you ever seen the inconspicuous Yorkshire Moss-Lynx? The Yorkshire Moss-Lynx is a rare form of feline which is only seen in the early hours of the morning.
Appearance	All Moss-Lynxes are easy to identify as they are the strangest wildcat in the British Isles. Typically, they are the size of a small horse and covered in thick, soft fur. The adult Moss-Lynx is a deep earthy-green colour which enables it to hide in mossy banks and dense woodland. However, juveniles are born with a blueish tinge.
Habitat	Experts say that this species of creature is found across the county of Yorkshire, especially in ancient woods and moorland dales where they feel safest. Did you know they sleep in cold, dark caves? Strangely, they spend most of the day in these caves and because they only roam in the early hours of the morning, are very rarely seen.
Best known for/diet	Interestingly, whilst most wildcats are renowned for stalking prey, the Moss-Lynx shows no interest in hunting small mammals or birds. They are only interested in playing Wordle and several Moss-Lynxes have become grandmaster champions. Surprisingly, it has been suggested that these shy and highly intelligent creatures like eating spiders. The most amazing thing about Moss-Lynxes is that despite living in Yorkshire, they hate tea! Thankfully, this breed of creature presents no danger to humans and indeed, some have been tamed as household pets!
Facts	Zoologists have been concerned for many years that Moss-Lynxes might be mistaken for other species and, therefore, become hunted. Where habitats have been discovered, their location is kept secret. To protect these mysterious and beautiful creatures, all animal lovers should make sure that vegetable peelings and cups of coffee are left out during snowy weather. It would be disastrous if another species of wildcat became extinct.
